

I'm running for Council because too often, the voice of the future is left out of the conversation. The world is changing fast, and my generation lives at the centre of that change. We're not just the future, we're part of the present, and we deserve to be heard.

As a second-generation Australian-Chinese, I'm proud of both sides of my culture, and I deeply value community. Born and raised in Perth, I've been active in multicultural and community organisations from a young age, learning that even small efforts can make a real difference.

At 18, I'm studying Business Law at UWA while remaining deeply involved in cultural organisations, youth programs, volunteering, and grassroots campaigns. Through these experiences I've seen both the challenges and opportunities Perth faces, and I'm passionate about being part of its growth and progress.

My vision is for a Perth that is both safer and more vibrant. Young people want to enjoy the city without worrying about how they'll get home, which means exploring practical improvements like better lighting, reliable transport, and a stronger sense of safety at night. Just as important is vibrancy. These are the events and experiences that make people feel welcome.

With your support, I will bring new energy, inclusivity, and a strong community voice to Council, helping shape a Perth that is safe, welcoming, and future-ready.
